

Ad Analysis: Before / After Comparison

Current issues and proposed fixes for Bubs Naturals, Vital Proteins, and Sports Research ads.

1. Video Hooks (First 3 Seconds)

Brand	BEFORE (Issue)	AFTER (Fix)
Bubs Naturals	Video is long, opens with a direct product pitch, doesn't spark curiosity.	Option 1: "3... 2... 1..." reverse countdown + an unexpected visual beat (a glass slamming onto a table). Product enters after second 4. Option 2: Confusing / inverted frame (upside-down or extreme close-up) for 2s, then "What did you just see?"
Vital Proteins	Visuals and music are strong, but the headline isn't compelling and doesn't create curiosity.	Option 1: Opening frame with bold text: "80% GET THIS WRONG" — existing scene continues behind it, text disappears after 1.5s. Option 2: Video appears to freeze at second 1 ("STOP" text), then continues with "You almost missed this."
Sports Research	Opening doesn't grab attention, slow entry into the topic, not memorable.	Option 1: Extreme close-up / unrecognizable texture (a sweating hand, etc.) for 1.5s, then the camera rapidly pulls back. Option 2: Fake notification screen ("Don't close this before it's done") for 1s, then the real video begins.

2. Google Ads Headlines (Price + Clarity First)

Brand	BEFORE (Issue)	AFTER (Fix)
Bubs Naturals	Already clear, with a discount stated, but the price isn't prominent in the headline.	"30% Off Collagen Peptides — Ends Tonight, Only $XX"
Vital Proteins	Has an offer, but the headline isn't compelling and doesn't create curiosity.	"Vital Proteins Collagen: 20% Off Today Only — $XX, Ships Free"
Sports Research	Just product + price written plainly, boring, no urgency element.	"Only 200 Left: Sports Research Collagen $XX — Order Before It's Gone"

General Principle

For video ads, the priority is curiosity and stopping the scroll — the product and message are deliberately delayed. For Google Ads, the user already arrives with search intent, so the priority is price, a clear offer, and urgency; mysterious or surprising hooks are not used here.

As a gym owner, there's three things I always look for when it comes to creatine.

1. Is it backed by science?

2. Does it provide the clinically studied amount?

3. Can I trust what's in it?

Recommendations

What's Working (Common Pattern Across Competitors)

Across the ads reviewed, the most common and generic format is a trainer, a specialist doctor, or an everyday person talking at length about the product — explaining its benefits, features, and repeatedly emphasizing that it has been scientifically tested. This format is widely used because it builds credibility, but it also tends to feel slow and repetitive when the talking segment runs too long.

On the visual side, what works best is a simple, uncluttered background in a single solid color, paired with upbeat, cheerful music. The ad should get straight to the point instead of easing into it slowly, so that Meta users are not bored before the message even lands. Keeping the setup minimal keeps attention on the product and the message rather than on distracting scenery.

Google Ads Headline Recommendations by Brand

Bubs Naturals: Should add image snippets to the ad, since the current listings rely on text only and lose visual impact next to competitors that show the product.

Vital Proteins: Should use stronger, more compelling headlines, since the current copy is clear but doesn't create curiosity or urgency.

Sports Research: Should add the price directly to the ad, since it is currently missing and leaves the offer feeling incomplete compared to competitors.

Final Picks

Video Hooks: The Sports Research fixed version was selected as the strongest direction — the extreme close-up opening followed by the camera pulling back creates a cinematic, attention-grabbing entry that fixes the brand's biggest issue (a slow, unmemorable opening).

Google Ads Headlines: The Bubs Naturals headline was selected as the strongest direction — leading with the discount and adding a clear deadline creates urgency while keeping the price front and center.
