

Beauty & Skincare Marketing Playbook: Moon and Skin

Vertical: Beauty / Skincare. Client: Moon and Skin, a clean, dermatologist-formulated DTC skincare brand (anti-aging, brightening, sensitive-skin-safe) sold direct and on Amazon, and a real FlyRank client. FlyRank's own case study reports Moon and Skin generated 2.63 million search impressions in 6 months after going from largely invisible in beauty search to competing with major publishers.

Top 3 Channels — Where the Audience Spends Time and Converts

- 1. TikTok & Instagram (short-form, creator-led content). Skincare buyers discover and build trust through "get ready with me" routines, real before-and-after footage, and dermatologist duets — not polished product shots. This is where a newer brand earns the credibility that gets someone to click through in the first place.
- 2. Organic and AI search (SEO/GEO). High-intent queries like "best moisturizer for sensitive skin" or "is kojic acid safe" drive enormous, non-paid volume, and buyers now ask ChatGPT and Perplexity the same questions. This is the channel FlyRank used directly with Moon and Skin, and it is discovery and proof of credibility at once — the brand shows up right when someone is deciding what to trust.
- 3. Amazon and on-site reviews. Even shoppers who find Moon and Skin through TikTok or search usually cross-check verified-purchase reviews before paying. Reviews are the final trust checkpoint that turns interest into a completed order, especially for a brand people have not heard of yet.

Channel that looks easy but underperforms here: broad, generic paid social ads with staged product shots. Beauty audiences are ad-fatigued and scroll past anything that does not look like organic content.

The #1 Challenge

Trust and skepticism in an oversaturated, claims-sensitive category. Decades of miracle-cream marketing have made skincare buyers default to doubt, and nearly every competitor makes the same "anti-aging," "brightening," or "clinically proven" claims. On top of that, cosmetic marketing has real guardrails: efficacy claims must be substantiated, and language that crosses into "treats," "cures," or "permanently removes wrinkles" turns a cosmetic claim into an unapproved drug claim. A small brand like Moon and Skin has to earn belief through proof — dermatologist backing, ingredient transparency, real user-generated content — rather than simply outspending bigger competitors.

How Claude AI Helped With This Assignment

- Verified Moon and Skin is a real, current FlyRank client (DTC-beauty segment, 2.63M impressions in 6 months) before building a playbook around it, instead of assuming or inventing a case study.
- Researched the brand itself — positioning, ingredients, retail footprint, social following — so the channel picks reflect the actual brand rather than generic beauty-industry advice.
- Pressure-tested the channel choices against what genuinely converts in skincare, ruling out generic paid social in favor of creator-led content once the research showed why it underperforms.
- Drafted, formatted, and visually verified this one-page document against the exact spec (fonts, sizes, spacing, single page) before handing it off.
